

Political Survival at Frederick-Town

James Wilkinson, Thomas Jefferson, Madison, and the Geography of Procedure

Repository Example for a Humanities Workflow

March 2026

Abstract

James Wilkinson's long political survival has usually been explained through his own agility, his talent for intrigue, or Jefferson's reluctance to abandon a useful subordinate. Frederick, Maryland, suggests a sharper answer. The surviving record shows that Wilkinson's tie to Jefferson rested less on ordinary friendship than on usefulness, executive backing, and the later language of remembered service. It also shows that Frederick was not merely the town in which his court-martial happened to sit. Between August 1811 and February 1812, War Department letters, interrogatories issued from Frederick Town, Wilkinson's own appeal to Madison, and Madison's approval of the Frederick-town acquittal place the town inside the machinery by which suspicion was narrowed into judgment. Read alongside the Jefferson–Wilkinson correspondence, these documents show Frederick as one of the places where political protection acquired venue, witnesses, and enforceable form. The town mattered because national scandal became governable there.

1 Introduction

James Wilkinson is one of the most difficult early American figures to write about because the verdict on his character arrives long before the analysis begins. He is remembered as ambitious, compromised, evasive, and, in many accounts, indefensibly corrupt. Yet he also remained near the center of federal power for decades. That endurance poses a better historical question than the simple moral one. How did he survive?

For a Frederick audience, the question becomes sharper. Wilkinson's story usually belongs to western intrigues, the Burr conspiracy, or the early republic's military weakness. Frederick, Maryland, appears only in passing, if at all. But the Frederick record suggests that the town was not merely scenery. It was one of the places where Wilkinson's political damage was managed, judged, and partly repaired.

This paper therefore studies two linked problems. First, what sort of relationship did Wilkinson actually have with Thomas Jefferson? Second, why does Frederick matter to the answer? The surviving letters do not support a naive friendship story. They show something more revealing: Wilkinson made himself useful to Jefferson through western intelligence, scientific curiosities, and crisis management; Jefferson in turn protected Wilkinson at crucial moments because abandoning him would also have weakened the administration's western policy and Burr narrative [Jefferson, 1807, Wilkinson, 1807a, Onuf, 2000, Lewis, 2017]. By 1811 and 1812, however, the theater of survival had shifted. The issue was no longer merely whether Jefferson believed Wilkinson, but where the nation's suspicions would be converted into institutional judgment. That question belongs not only to political biography but to the history of executive management and military administration in the early republic [Kohn, 1975, Stagg, 1983, Watson, 2012]. In this case, the answer leads to Frederick-town [Wilkinson, 1811b, Madison, 1812].

Modern scholarship has usually met Wilkinson in one of three ways. Biographers have emphasized duplicity, opportunism, and his extraordinary ability to escape the consequences of his conduct [Jacobs, 1938, Linklater, 2009, Cox, 2023]. Studies of the Burr crisis have treated him as a central actor in a larger national emergency shaped by rumor, fear, and the unstable politics of loyalty [Lewis, 2017, Sharp, 1993, Wood, 2009]. Work on honor and scandal in the early republic has made clear that such crises were fought not only through facts but through confidence, slander, vindication, and official backing [Freeman, 2002, Kierner, 2024]. Scholarship on military authority and the officer corps further suggests that questions of loyalty, usefulness, and protection were inseparable from the administrative life of the early national state [Kohn, 1975, Stagg, 1983, Watson, 2012]. This paper joins that literature at a more local scale. It asks where Wilkinson’s survival became administratively and legally durable.

The local angle deepens rather than narrows the problem. Frederick appears in at least three distinct ways. First, Wilkinson had an older Maryland footing near Monocacy, recorded in later archival description and echoed in local county history [University of Michigan William L. Clements Library, 2025, Tracey and Dern, 1987]. Second, the town belonged to the military geography of the Jeffersonian West, with the Frederick Barracks serving as a depot for Lewis and Clark in 1802 [Historic Frederick Barracks Historical Marker, 2024, Onuf, 2000]. Third, and most important, Frederick-town became the administrative and legal setting in which Wilkinson’s crisis was organized, heard, and ratified. By late summer 1811 the War Department understood Frederick as the intended venue; by September Madison was leaving the case in the hands of the Frederick tribunal while Eustis arranged attendance for the requested officers; by October interrogatories and appeals were moving in and out of Frederick Town as part of the defense record [Eustis, 1811a, Madison, 1811, Eustis, 1811b, Kinson, 1811, Wilkinson, 1811b, Adams, 1811]. In the broader literature on military justice and administration, those are not incidental details. They are the mechanics by which accusation became a formal proceeding and formal proceeding became settlement [Lurie, 2001, Kohn, 1975, Stagg, 1983]. Put differently, Frederick stood at the junction of western empire, military infrastructure, and procedural survival.

That framing places the paper in a narrower lane than a full Wilkinson biography. The question here is not whether he deserves rescue from his reputation. It is how a compromised man remained usable, and why Frederick belongs inside that answer. For a Frederick audience, the town’s importance lies not in having touched a notorious figure, but in having helped shape the form through which his crisis was judged.

The argument proceeds in four steps. Section 2 makes the evidence ladder explicit so that direct presidential correspondence, Frederick procedure documents, and later local amplifications are not pressed with the same force. Section 3 reconstructs the Jefferson–Wilkinson relationship across three phases: access through usefulness, crisis through protection, and afterlife through remembered service. Section 4 shows why Frederick belongs inside that relationship rather than beside it. Section 5 uses a small coded corpus to check whether the prose claims match the documentary pattern. The result is a local-history argument built on a compact but inspectable documentary base.

The paper makes two main claims. The first is interpretive: Wilkinson’s tie to Jefferson was politically personal and survival-oriented rather than simply affectionate. The second is local:

Frederick Town was one of the key places in which executive protection became procedure, evidence, and official settlement.

2 Sources and Approach

The evidence base for this paper is deliberately compact and transparent. The curated corpus contains twenty-two records:

- nineteen primary or near-primary documents from Founders Online;
- three local or public-history sources tied specifically to Frederick and Wilkinson’s Maryland geography.

The primary records focus on three clusters. The first cluster covers early access and usefulness: Jefferson’s 1801 effort to reach both Wilkinson and Meriwether Lewis through the same forwarding network, Wilkinson’s 1802 gift of river-water samples and fossils, the 1804 dinner invitation, and the 1805 buffalo-hide map letter [Jefferson, 1801, Wilkinson, 1802, 1804b, 1805]. The second cluster centers on the Burr crisis, where Jefferson’s support and Wilkinson’s anxious replies reveal a relationship of mutual need rather than sentiment [Jefferson, 1807, Wilkinson, 1807a,b]. The third cluster covers rehabilitation and afterlife. It includes Wilkinson’s 1811 memoir campaign and Jefferson’s reassuring response, but it now also includes a fuller Frederick procedural chain: venue planning inside the War Department, Madison’s refusal to preempt the Frederick tribunal, witness orders, interrogatories sent from Frederick Town, Wilkinson’s own complaint to Madison, Adams’s testimonial reply, Madison’s approval of the acquittal, and the 1818 exchange of retrospective esteem [Wilkinson, 1811a, Jefferson, 1811, Eustis, 1811a, Madison, 1811, Eustis, 1811b, Kinson, 1811, Wilkinson, 1811b, Adams, 1811, Madison, 1812, Jefferson, 1818, Wilkinson, 1818].

The local sources were chosen for function, not decoration. The Frederick Barracks marker preserves the claim that the barracks served both Lewis and Clark and later War of 1812 military traffic [Historic Frederick Barracks Historical Marker, 2024]. The Clements Library finding aid preserves the biographical note that Wilkinson practiced medicine in Monocacy, Maryland [University of Michigan William L. Clements Library, 2025]. The Maryland Historical Magazine article on Roger Brooke Taney preserves the later tradition that Frederick lawyers defended Wilkinson without fee during the court-martial [Delaplaine, 1918]. Read against the older Taney biographies and later scholarship, that tradition belongs to a real Frederick legal world even if it does not settle every factual detail on its own [Swisher, 1935, Smith, 1936, Huebner, 2010]. None of these sources is sufficient alone; together they thicken the local setting around a primary Frederick dossier that is now much stronger than it was at the start of this project.

The claim structure is therefore tiered. The paper’s strongest argument — that Jefferson and Wilkinson were linked more by utility, protection, and political management than by simple intimacy — rests mainly on the eleven direct Jefferson–Wilkinson records and the surrounding official correspondence. The Frederick argument is now strongest where Frederick appears in primary or near-primary documents as a venue of reputational defense, court-martial procedure, evidence gathering, and presidentially acknowledged acquittal. It is more interpretive where the local role depends on later public-history or biographical framing. Making that distinction explicit matters for a local-history audience: Frederick is important here, but not every part of its importance stands on the same evidentiary footing.

Evidence tier	Records
Direct Jefferson–Wilkinson primary correspondence	11
Primary Frederick venue and outcome records	8
Contextual Frederick local sources	3
Primary share of Frederick-linked corpus	73%

Table 1: Evidence ladder for the paper’s core claims. The Jefferson–Wilkinson thesis rests mostly on direct correspondence, while the Frederick synthesis combines a substantial primary procedural chain with contextual local sources.

Year	Document	Function in argument
1804	Wilkinson to Adams on fame	Shows Frederick as an early site of reputational self-defense
1811	Eustis on venue	Shows Frederick chosen in advance as the intended court-martial venue
1811	Madison on jurisdiction	Shows the president leaving the Frederick tribunal in possession of the case
1811	Eustis on witness orders	Shows the War Department mobilizing officers for the Frederick proceedings
1811	Wilkinson on fairness	Shows Frederick as the place where Wilkinson sought procedural fairness
1811	Kinson with interrogatories	Shows Frederick reaching outward to collect testimony by interrogatory
1812	Madison on acquittal	Puts Frederick into the federal record through approved acquittal
1811	Adams in reply	Shows national testimony flowing back into the Frederick defense record

Table 2: The Frederick primary documentary chain used in the paper’s core local argument. These records show venue choice, jurisdiction, evidence gathering, plea, and settlement before later contextual sources are added.

The interpretive frame, however, is broader than the corpus. This reading of Wilkinson is informed by older and newer biography, by scholarship on the Burr crisis, by studies of honor, rumor, and political reputation in the early republic, and by work on military justice and administration [Jacobs, 1938, Linklater, 2009, Cox, 2023, Lewis, 2017, Freeman, 2002, Kierner, 2024, Lurie, 2001, Kohn, 1975, Stagg, 1983, Watson, 2012]. Those works do not supply the paper’s local evidence. They do help explain why the language of utility, defense, esteem, venue, and procedural settlement belongs to the period rather than to retrospective editorial invention.

Table 1 makes that hierarchy visible. The Frederick claim is not built from one sort of record alone. It now stands on an eight-document primary chain — from the 1804 Frederick Town letter to Adams through the 1811 War Department and interrogatory record to Madison’s 1812 approval of the Frederick-town acquittal — then thickens that chain with three local contextual sources. That layered structure is exactly why the paper can make a confident local argument without pretending every sentence has the same documentary force.

Table 2 makes the Frederick dossier inspectable in a second way: not just by count, but by function. The primary records do different argumentative jobs. Taken together, they show venue choice, executive restraint, witness management, outward evidence collection, plea, testimonial

Metric	Value
Coded records in corpus	22
Frederick-linked records	11 (50%)
Frederick-linked records in rehabilitation phase	7
Non-social survival modes	16
Pure social-access mode	1
Retrospective-esteem mode	2

Table 3: Core metrics from the coded corpus. The counts support a relationship defined much more by use and protection than by simple friendship.

return, and formal federal settlement.

The coded layer is modest by design. It assigns each record a phase, relationship mode, and Frederick role; generates an event timeline; counts a small lexicon of warmth, utility, and defense terms in the excerpted correspondence; and builds a weighted network from the named relationships in the corpus. These outputs are heuristic. They do not decide the argument on their own, and network position should not be confused with causal proof. Their value is disciplinary rather than magical. If the prose claims that the relationship was mostly instrumental, or that Frederick was more than incidental, the documentary pattern has to carry that weight.

The method also makes the paper easier to challenge in concrete ways. A corpus dominated by private-social records would weaken the claim that usefulness mattered more than friendship. A Frederick set made up only of late local memory would weaken the argument that Frederick was procedurally important rather than ceremonially convenient. The evidence is laid out this way so that readers can test those possibilities directly instead of taking the interpretation on trust.

The first descriptive result is already revealing. Of the twenty-two coded records, eleven are Frederick-linked. Only one record is primarily a social-access document, the 1804 dinner invitation note. By contrast, sixteen turn on use, defense, procedure, testimony, or settlement. The Frederick-linked subset is also not a one-note cluster: it spans reputational repair, venue choice, jurisdiction, witness coordination, interrogatory collection, trial venue, trial outcome, external testimony, infrastructure, local origin, and legal alliance. The numbers do not replace reading, but they do caution against an overly sentimental portrait.

3 Jefferson and Wilkinson: Access, Usefulness, Protection

The surviving record suggests that Jefferson and Wilkinson were neither strangers nor intimate friends. They occupied a more typical but harder-to-name early republican relationship: proximity built from usefulness, then tested by crisis.

The relationship is easiest to understand in three stages. The first stage, from 1801 to 1805, is access through usefulness: Wilkinson keeps bringing Jefferson things he can use, whether information, specimens, maps, or western intermediaries. The second stage, centered on 1807, is survival through executive protection: Jefferson’s backing matters because Burr makes Wilkinson simultaneously valuable and vulnerable. The third stage, from 1811 to 1818, is memory through selective esteem: Jefferson does not canonize Wilkinson’s character, but he continues to credit his services and refuses to join the loudest chorus of suspicion. Read this way, the relationship has a shape. It is political intimacy under pressure, not ordinary friendship.

The early correspondence shows Wilkinson presenting himself as a man worth keeping in Jefferson's circle because he could provide western knowledge, objects, and personnel. In 1802 he sent river-water samples and fossils because they "may not be unacceptable" to Jefferson [Wilkinson, 1802]. In 1805 he forwarded a buffalo-hide map and vouched for Captain Amos Stoddard as a man of intelligence, closing with "perfect respect" and "sincere attachment" [Wilkinson, 1805]. Even the 1804 dinner note is revealing: social access existed, but it was immediately absorbed back into public business through Humboldt, Texas, and Mexico [Wilkinson, 1804b]. The relationship was personal enough for dinner, but the dinner itself seems to have been another venue for utility.

That distinction matters for the paper's use of the phrase personal relationship. The letters do show manners, favors, invitations, and affective language. But in early republican elite correspondence those signals do not automatically mean private friendship in the modern sense. They often indicate access, patronage, and mutual placement within a governing circle. Wilkinson's surviving language toward Jefferson is therefore best read as politically personal rather than domestically intimate: close enough for favors, never detached from usefulness.

That pattern became explicit during the Burr crisis. Jefferson's letter of 3 February 1807 is the clearest proof that Wilkinson's survival was tied to presidential need. Jefferson reassured him that "we ... have not failed to strengthen the public confidence in you" and promised that he would be "cordially supported in the line of your duties" [Jefferson, 1807]. That is not the language of detached neutrality. It is the language of a president who needs his general's credibility to hold while Burr's conspiracy is being narrated to the nation.

Wilkinson understood the asymmetry perfectly. His answer of 20 March 1807 thanked Jefferson for the "sweet Solace" of sympathy and described presidential support as "the warrant of part confidence & the pledge of future trust" [Wilkinson, 1807a]. In April he went further and looked "for Orders & direction" concerning "time & place" [Wilkinson, 1807b]. Wilkinson was not writing as a friend seeking consolation. He was writing as a compromised subordinate who needed executive endorsement to remain a usable instrument.

The 1811 exchange sharpens the point. Wilkinson's memoir letter to Jefferson is drenched in persecution and honor. He writes under "the pressure of my persecutions" and presents his memoirs as a weapon against public falsehood [Wilkinson, 1811a]. Jefferson's answer is warm but carefully framed. He dismisses the "under my thumb" slander, says he believes Wilkinson because of his own knowledge of Burr and Wilkinson's conduct, and hopes the general's "Argosy may ride out" the storm [Jefferson, 1811]. The letter matters because Jefferson refuses to join the chorus of suspicion. Yet even here the belief is grounded in political history and conduct, not in intimate testimony about character.

Madison's role shows the next step in the same survival chain. Jefferson supplied reassurance, memory, and interpretive cover. Madison later supplied ratification. The distinction matters because Wilkinson did not survive only by remaining believable to Jefferson; he survived when executive sympathy was translated into a restored commission and an approved acquittal. Put differently, Jefferson helped keep Wilkinson politically viable, but Madison helped certify that viability in federal form.

The tables make the stage structure easier to see. Wilkinson's excerpted voice in this corpus carries more defense terms than warmth terms, while Jefferson's language balances warmth with utility and judgment. The phase-by-mode summary then shows why: the Burr crisis collapses almost entirely into protection, while the rehabilitation cluster mixes self-vindication, War Department procedure, testimonial gathering, and official settlement. Wilkinson needed Jefferson more

Author	Warmth	Utility	Defense	Total
James Wilkinson	4	5	6	15
Thomas Jefferson	2	4	2	8

Table 4: Lexicon counts from excerpted correspondence and summaries. Wilkinson’s surviving voice is especially saturated with defense language, while Jefferson’s is warmer only when folded into judgment and utility.

Phase	Inst.	Prot.	Self-vind.	Proced.	Official	Esteem	Testimony
Access / utility	2	0	0	0	0	0	0
Frontier brokerage	1	0	0	0	0	0	0
Burr crisis	0	3	0	0	0	0	0
Frederick repair	0	0	1	0	0	0	0
Rehabilitation	0	1	1	3	1	0	1
Retrospective memory	0	0	0	0	0	2	0
Local context	0	0	0	0	0	0	0

Table 5: Phase-by-mode summary from the coded corpus. The Burr crisis is almost purely protective, while rehabilitation mixes self-defense, procedure, testimony, and official settlement.

urgently than Jefferson needed Wilkinson personally; Jefferson needed Wilkinson primarily when western policy, Burr, or later retrospective memory made him useful. The 1818 correspondence confirms the shift. Jefferson’s estimate of Wilkinson’s services remained “unaltered,” and Wilkinson treasured the “approbation & esteem” as recognition long denied by the public [Jefferson, 1818, Wilkinson, 1818]. What remained, then, was not intimacy in the ordinary sense. It was a durable politics of remembered service.

4 Frederick as the Geography of Survival

Once the relationship is seen as one of utility and protection rather than friendship, Frederick’s importance becomes clearer. Wilkinson did not survive in the abstract. He survived in places, through venues, procedures, witnesses, and local allies. Frederick is one of the places where that process can be followed document by document.

The sequence now begins earlier and runs more continuously than the paper first suggested. In September 1804 Wilkinson was already writing from Frederick Town to John Adams in order to justify his conduct and preserve “my Fame” against attack [Wilkinson, 1804a]. That letter matters because it shows Frederick before the famous court-martial, already serving as a place from which Wilkinson answered challenges to his authority.

The 1811 record then turns Frederick from setting into mechanism. In August, William Eustis reported to Madison that Wilkinson intended to have the court-martial “in Frederick town” [Eustis, 1811a]. By mid-September Madison was treating the case as already “in possession of the Court Martial” at Frederick Town and saw no reason to interrupt it with further executive instructions [Madison, 1811]. Ten days later Eustis reported that orders had gone out to secure the attendance of the officers requested by the court [Eustis, 1811b]. These letters do not merely place the trial in Frederick. They show the venue being chosen, respected, and supplied. In the terms used by historians of military justice, they also show that the proceeding was administrative as well as local:

jurisdiction, witness procurement, and executive restraint were all part of the machinery by which the case acquired legal force [Lurie, 2001, Kohn, 1975, Stagg, 1983].

The October papers deepen the point. From Frederick Town, Jabeil Kinson sent interrogatories to Adams “by order of the General Court Martial” [Kinson, 1811]. Wilkinson himself then wrote from Frederick Town to Madison that the proceedings should remain “free & unbiased” and without even the appearance that he was being denied “a fair & impartial decision” [Wilkinson, 1811b]. Adams replied that he considered the old rumors against Wilkinson “Calumnies” and answered the interrogatories accordingly [Adams, 1811]. By then Frederick was no longer just the place where the court sat. It was the operating address from which evidence was gathered, fairness was pleaded, and distant testimony was drawn back into the defense.

That procedural record clarifies the paper’s executive logic. Jefferson’s letters mattered because they sustained Wilkinson’s credibility in the face of scandal. Madison’s role mattered because he oversaw the governmental transition from sympathy to enforceable settlement. When Madison later informed Jefferson that he had examined the proceedings of the “General Court Martial held at Frederick-town” and approved Wilkinson’s acquittal, ordering Wilkinson’s sword restored, Frederick was written into the federal record of survival itself [Madison, 1812]. That sequence looks less accidental when set beside the broader literature on early republican civil-military management, where command, confidence, and institutional continuity were often bound together [Kohn, 1975, Stagg, 1983, Watson, 2012].

The local contextual sources now read in a more disciplined order. A later archival note that Wilkinson practiced medicine near Monocacy keeps Frederick County in his older Maryland world [University of Michigan William L. Clements Library, 2025, Tracey and Dern, 1987]. The Frederick Barracks marker places the town inside the military geography of the Jeffersonian West, though it should not be asked to prove more than that [Historic Frederick Barracks Historical Marker, 2024, Onuf, 2000]. The later Taney tradition should likewise be used carefully. Its value lies less in settling every detail of the defense than in preserving how Frederick remembered the case: not as a passing spectacle, but as a serious legal undertaking [Delaplaine, 1918]. Read alongside Taney scholarship, that memory sits within a recognizable Frederick legal milieu rather than floating free of context [Swisher, 1935, Smith, 1936, Huebner, 2010]. These sources thicken the setting. They no longer have to carry the core claim on their own.

The corpus-level place ranking reinforces the same conclusion from another angle. Frederick Town is not merely one Maryland location among several. It is the heaviest place node in the source network and remains among the largest nodes even when the later local-context materials are removed. That prominence does not prove causality by itself, but it supports the narrower claim the paper now makes with more confidence: Frederick was one of the main local geographies in which Wilkinson’s survival was made workable.

That is why the Frederick angle is not a local flourish. It changes the argument. Wilkinson survived because presidential protection met a place where scandal could be processed into venue, testimony, judgment, and official settlement.

5 Patterns in the Corpus

The tables and figures in this section are deliberately simple. Their purpose is not to turn a small humanities corpus into a false science. It is to make the paper’s descriptive claims easier to inspect.

First, the event timeline shows that Frederick-linked records are not evenly distributed. They cluster in two meaningful zones. One is the earlier zone of Maryland footing and reputational management, including the Monocacy context and the 1804 Adams letter. The other is the rehabilitation zone of 1811 and 1812, where Frederick becomes the court-martial site and the place from which Wilkinson appeals directly to presidential fairness. The point is not merely that Frederick appears often. It appears when Wilkinson is most in need of repair.

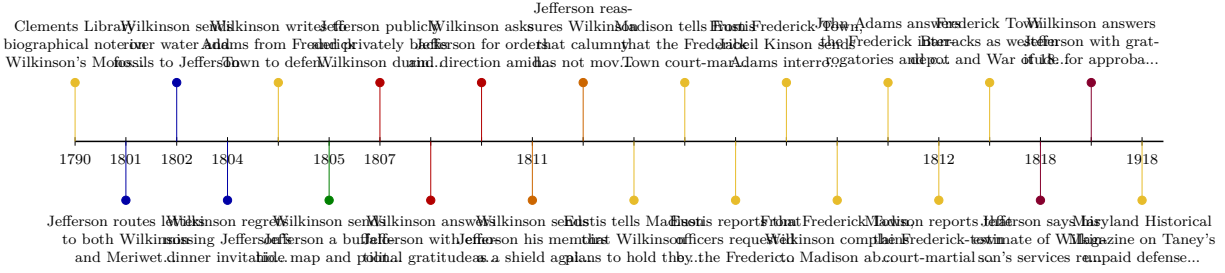

Figure 1: Event timeline of the curated Wilkinson corpus. Gold points mark Frederick-linked records. The clustering of gold points after 1804 shows Frederick as a repeated site of repair rather than a random afterthought.

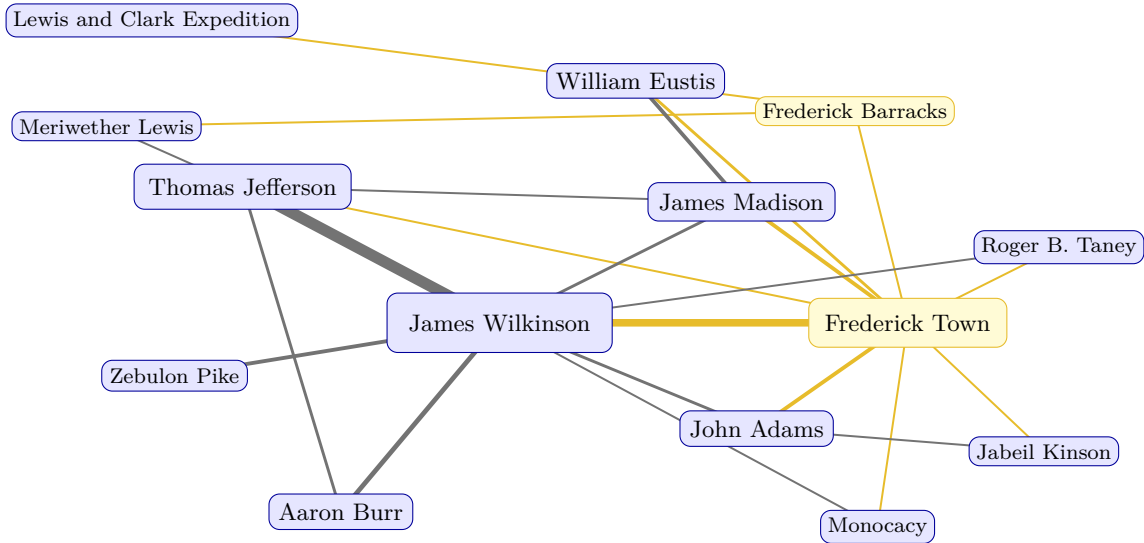

Figure 2: Weighted connection network derived from the coded corpus. Node size and edge width both reflect weight. Frederick appears not merely as backdrop but as a bridge node linking Wilkinson to Adams, Madison, Taney, and the barracks that also served Jefferson’s western projects.

Second, the weighted connection network now places Frederick Town as the heaviest place node in the corpus and the second-heaviest node overall, behind only Wilkinson himself. That ranking is historically useful. It means Frederick is not just a side label attached to one trial. It connects outward to Adams, Madison, Eustis, Taney, the barracks, and Wilkinson himself. In a small, curated corpus, that kind of centrality is best read as a descriptive pattern rather than a mechanical proof, but it does show that the local place is carrying more than anecdotal weight.

Third, the corpus metrics help separate intimacy from function. Only one record in the full set is primarily a social-access document. By contrast, sixteen turn on use, protection, defense, procedure, testimony, or settlement. This does not prove that Jefferson disliked Wilkinson or that Author	Warmth / 1000 tok.	Utility / 1000 tok.	Defense / 1000 tok.

James Wilkinson	10.93	13.66	16.39
Thomas Jefferson	10.93	21.86	10.93

Table 6: Normalized theme rates per 1000 tokens in the coded excerpts and summaries. The normalized view still leaves Wilkinson’s voice more defense-heavy than warmth-heavy, while Jefferson remains most associated with utility language.

Primary-only node	Weight
James Wilkinson	28
Thomas Jefferson	16
Frederick Town	16
James Madison	9
John Adams	6

Table 7: Top nodes in the primary-only connection network. Frederick Town remains one of the heaviest nodes even when the later local-context sources are removed.

Wilkinson felt no real attachment. It does show that the documentary relationship, as it survives on paper, was mostly organized around use, defense, and political adjudication.

Fourth, the theme counts are modest but suggestive. Wilkinson’s coded excerpts contain more defense language than warmth language; Jefferson’s contain more utility language than warmth language. The pattern fits the historical reading. Wilkinson wrote upward to save himself. Jefferson wrote downward to steady an officer he still found usable, then later to preserve a memory of service without reopening every scandal.

The normalized theme-rate check in Table 6 makes the same point more conservatively. Once token volume is taken into account, Wilkinson still runs defense-heavier than warmth, while Jefferson remains most closely associated with utility language. That does not turn a small lexicon into sentiment science. It simply shows that the asymmetry survives a stricter denominator.

Fifth, the evidence-tier counts help show why the local argument is stronger than a ceremonial hometown claim. Nearly three quarters of the Frederick-linked corpus is primary. The Frederick set now includes not just an early reputational-defense letter, a plea for fairness, and an acquittal notice, but also venue planning, jurisdiction management, witness coordination, interrogatory practice, and testimonial return. That balance matters because it means the paper is not deriving its Frederick thesis from later local boosterism alone.

The primary-only network provides a related robustness check. Once the later local-context materials are removed, Frederick Town remains tied with Jefferson as the second-heaviest node in the connection graph, behind only Wilkinson. That is the right result for this paper. It does not mean Frederick outweighs the national actors. It means Frederick remains structurally visible even in the documentary core.

The place-node ranking sharpens the local point further. Frederick Town outranks the Frederick Barracks and Monocacy both in the full corpus and in the primary-only subset. That matters because it shows the argument is not simply about any Maryland geography touching Wilkinson. It is specifically about Frederick as the most active local place in the documentary chain of survival.

These results are best understood as corroboration. They do not replace historical judgment, and the corpus is too selective to support extravagant quantitative claims. They do, however, make

Place node	Full corpus	Primary-only
Frederick Town	20	16
Frederick Barracks	3	0
Monocacy	2	0

Table 8: Place-node ranking in the connection network. Frederick Town dominates both in the full corpus and in the primary-only subset, reinforcing its role as the paper’s central local geography.

one thing harder to deny: if a local society wants to know why Frederick matters in the Wilkinson story, the answer is visible not only in prose but in the shape, timing, and evidentiary layering of the surviving record itself.

6 Conclusion

James Wilkinson survived because he was useful before he was defensible. Jefferson’s relationship with him was built on that usefulness, especially in the western theater and during the Burr crisis. When accusations mounted, Jefferson’s support and later Madison’s approval did not erase suspicion. They did something narrower and more political: they kept him in service. In that respect Wilkinson belongs to a larger early republic story in which reputation, command, and executive management were closely entangled [Freeman, 2002, Kohn, 1975, Stagg, 1983].

Frederick matters because viability needed a place. Wilkinson’s older Maryland footing and the barracks’ connection to Jeffersonian western logistics still matter as background, but the heart of the case now lies elsewhere: the 1804 Frederick letter to Adams, the 1811 venue and witness letters between Eustis and Madison, the interrogatories sent from Frederick Town, Wilkinson’s own plea for an unbiased hearing, Adams’s testimonial reply, and the 1812 approval of the Fredericktown acquittal. Read together, those records show Frederick as one of the towns in which national scandal became manageable federal procedure [Lurie, 2001].

That is the paper’s main contribution. It reframes a notorious national figure through a local geography of survival. For a Frederick historical society, the most important takeaway is not that Wilkinson once appeared there. It is that Frederick helped turn his story from possible ruin into continued career. Frederick was not an incidental stage set. It was one of the working mechanisms.

The note should still be read with evidentiary discipline. The core relationship claim rests most securely on direct correspondence and official records. The Frederick claim is now stronger than a simple local gloss because most of its documentary chain is primary, but the thicker local texture still depends in part on a small number of later Frederick-centered sources. That does not weaken the synthesis, but it does define its proper scale: this paper offers a strong, source-accountable interpretation, not the last archival word on Wilkinson.

That scale is also what makes the paper useful for public history. A local historical society does not need Wilkinson to become admirable in order for Frederick to matter. It needs a documented account of how local place entered a national political story. On that narrower but important question, the evidence is strong. Frederick appears not as a sentimental hometown cameo but as one of the places through which executive protection became durable enough to outlast scandal.

There is also a public-history reason to keep difficult actors in view. Wilkinson is not valuable because he is morally exemplary. He is valuable because compromised figures often show most clearly how institutions, places, and reputations actually work. Following him does not ask Frederick to celebrate him. It asks the town to recognize that local history can illuminate national power most sharply when it traces how messy lives were processed, defended, and judged.

If this note were expanded for a broader scholarly venue, the next archival step would be clear: a deeper integration of the full court-martial record, Burr-era newspapers, Frederick legal manuscripts, and the surviving Taney papers to test how far the Frederick-centered procedural story can be extended beyond the compact documentary chain used here.

A Appendix: Corpus Design

The corpus in this package is intentionally small and auditable. Each record stores:

- date and location;
- author and recipient;
- phase of Wilkinson’s career;
- a relationship-mode label;
- optional Frederick-role coding;
- a short excerpt and summary;
- source URL;
- named connections used for the network figure.

This design makes the paper easy to inspect and criticize. A reader can disagree with the coding while still seeing exactly how the paper’s figures were produced. That transparency matters for a humanities workflow because it prevents the computational layer from turning into black-box authority.

Coding Rules

Three coding rules matter especially for this note. First, a record is marked Frederick-linked only if Frederick, Frederick Town, Monocacy, the Frederick Barracks, or a clearly Frederick-based legal alliance is part of the document’s historical function rather than a passing geographic mention. Second, direct Jefferson–Wilkinson correspondence is kept analytically distinct from surrounding official or local material because it carries the strongest weight for the relationship claim. Third, later local sources are used to thicken setting and legal memory, not to outrank contemporaneous presidential or court-martial records.

Inclusion Logic

The corpus is not a complete Wilkinson archive. It is a purpose-built working set designed to answer one question well: how Jeffersonian protection and Frederick procedure intersected in Wilkinson’s survival. A record is included if it illuminates at least one of four functions: access and usefulness, executive protection, Frederick as venue or infrastructure, Frederick procedure or testimony, or retrospective memory. That inclusion logic keeps the package compact enough for a local-history audience to audit while still broad enough to test the paper’s main interpretive claim.

What Is Not Included

This corpus does not attempt to exhaust every possible Wilkinson source class. It does not include the full court-martial transcript, the complete Burr-era newspaper war, or the wider Wilkinson manuscript universe in Maryland, Louisiana, and federal military records. Those omissions matter if the goal is a larger archival monograph. They matter less for the narrower claim of this paper, which asks how Jeffersonian protection and Frederick procedure appear in a compact, inspectable documentary chain. The exclusions therefore limit the scale of the claim without collapsing it.

References

- John Adams. From john adams to james wilkinson, 12 october 1811, 1811. Founders Online, National Archives.
- Howard W. Cox. American Traitor: General James Wilkinson's Betrayal of the Republic and Escape from Justice. Georgetown University Press, Washington, DC, 2023.
- Theodore Delaplaine. Roger brooke taney. Maryland Historical Magazine, 13(2), 1918.
- William Eustis. William eustis to james madison, 13 august 1811, 1811a. Founders Online, National Archives.
- William Eustis. William eustis to james madison, 25 september 1811, 1811b. Founders Online, National Archives.
- Joanne B. Freeman. Affairs of Honor: National Politics in the New Republic. Yale University Press, New Haven, 2002.
- Historic Frederick Barracks Historical Marker. Historic frederick barracks historical marker, 2024. Historical Marker Database.
- Timothy S. Huebner. Roger b. taney and the slavery issue: Looking beyond—and before—dred scott. Journal of American History, 97(1):17–38, 2010.
- James Ripley Jacobs. Tarnished Warrior: Major-General James Wilkinson. Macmillan, New York, 1938.
- Thomas Jefferson. Thomas jefferson to tarleton bates, [23?] february 1801, 1801. Founders Online, National Archives.
- Thomas Jefferson. From thomas jefferson to james wilkinson, 3 february 1807, 1807. Founders Online, National Archives.
- Thomas Jefferson. Thomas jefferson to james wilkinson, 10 march 1811, 1811. Founders Online, National Archives.
- Thomas Jefferson. Thomas jefferson to james wilkinson, 25 june 1818, 1818. Founders Online, National Archives.
- Cynthia A. Kierner. Scandal at Bizarre: Rumor and Reputation in Jefferson's America. University of Virginia Press, Charlottesville, 2024.

- Jabeil Kinson. To john adams from jabeil kinson, 2 october 1811, 1811. Founders Online, National Archives.
- Richard H. Kohn. Eagle and Sword: The Federalists and the Creation of the Military Establishment in America, 1783–1802. Free Press, New York, 1975.
- Jr. Lewis, James E. The Burr Conspiracy: Uncovering the Story of an Early American Crisis. Princeton University Press, Princeton, 2017.
- Andro Linklater. An Artist in Treason: The Extraordinary Double Life of General James Wilkinson. Walker & Company, New York, 2009.
- Jonathan Lurie. Military Justice in America: The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, 1775–1980. University Press of Kansas, Lawrence, 2001.
- James Madison. James madison to william eustis, 15 september 1811, 1811. Founders Online, National Archives.
- James Madison. James madison to thomas jefferson, 7 february 1812, 1812. Founders Online, National Archives.
- Peter S. Onuf. Jefferson's Empire: The Language of American Nationhood. University Press of Virginia, Charlottesville, 2000.
- James Roger Sharp. American Politics in the Early Republic: The New Nation in Crisis. Yale University Press, New Haven, 1993.
- Jr. Smith, Charles W. Roger B. Taney: Jacksonian Jurist. University of North Carolina Press, Chapel Hill, 1936.
- J. C. A. Stagg. Mr. Madison's War: Politics, Diplomacy, and Warfare in the Early Republic, 1783–1830. Princeton University Press, Princeton, 1983.
- Carl Brent Swisher. Roger B. Taney. Macmillan, New York, 1935.
- Grace L. Tracey and John P. Dern. Pioneers of Old Monocacy: The Early Settlement of Frederick County, Maryland, 1721–1743. Genealogical Publishing Company, Baltimore, 1987.
- University of Michigan William L. Clements Library. Wilkinson-burbeck letters, 1796–1797, 2025. Finding aid.
- Samuel J. Watson. Jackson's Sword: The Army Officer Corps on the American Frontier, 1810–1821. University Press of Kansas, Lawrence, 2012.
- James Wilkinson. James wilkinson to thomas jefferson, 18 january 1802, 1802. Founders Online, National Archives.
- James Wilkinson. To john adams from james wilkinson, 12 september 1804, 1804a. Founders Online, National Archives.
- James Wilkinson. James wilkinson to thomas jefferson, 11 june 1804, 1804b. Founders Online, National Archives.

James Wilkinson. To thomas jefferson from james wilkinson, 22 october 1805, 1805. Founders Online, National Archives.

James Wilkinson. To thomas jefferson from james wilkinson, 20 march 1807, 1807a. Founders Online, National Archives.

James Wilkinson. To thomas jefferson from james wilkinson, 15 april 1807, 1807b. Founders Online, National Archives.

James Wilkinson. James wilkinson to thomas jefferson, 21 january 1811, 1811a. Founders Online, National Archives.

James Wilkinson. James wilkinson to james madison, 9 october 1811, 1811b. Founders Online, National Archives.

James Wilkinson. James wilkinson to thomas jefferson, 4 august 1818, 1818. Founders Online, National Archives.

Gordon S. Wood. Empire of Liberty: A History of the Early Republic, 1789–1815. Oxford University Press, New York, 2009.